What affected me the most was the idea that sometimes brick walls are to redirect us, but more importantly to show you how much you truly want something. How hard are you willing to work for this, how badly do you need it. And if you want it bad enough, then that brick wall is there for someone else who doesn't want it so bad. Some challenges I face I take to mean that I'm not meant for it. Doesn't matter if I want it, if there's a challenge on my path then it absolutely means redirect. I really appreciate and identify with this message, because it is more in line with my mindset now. It was difficult to go back to school this semester. Between scheduling conflicts, working full time, not sure where this degree would take me or end. Before any amount of indecision on big life stuff would stop me all together. But instead I looked at what I wanted and needed and decided that the pain of not going to school overruled the discomfort of getting through these next few months.
